MY GENTLE SISTER KATE.

BY MRS. SOPHIA H. OLIVER.

Thine eyes are very blue, How like the violet's silken cheek, When bathed in diamond dew.
Or like the amethystine hues
That paint the summer sky,
While o'er thy pure and rose-hued cheek, Hope's sweet emotions fly. And soft beneath thy fringed lids With joyous life elate, by merry soul sheds summer round, My gentle sister Kate!

But though thy lofty brow is fair,
Thy form of Grecian mould,
And though thy auburn tresses fall
In many a graceful fold,
And though around thy classic mouth The sportive graces lie,
And paint upon their rosy couch,
The feelings as they fly
Yet not for these, Oh! not for these Doth thy sweet form create
Within my heart such tenderness,
My gentle sister Kate!

Within thy heart enshrined, Within thy heart enshrined,
Thy artlessness—thy tenderness—
The graces of thy mind;
And for the sunny smile that plays
Along thy lovely face,
Where our sweet mother's image fair
Methinks I faintly trace.
And for sweet visions of the past,
With young joy animate,
When thou wert home's bright pleiade,
My gentle sister Kate!

I mind me of the bright-eyed hours When thou a lovely child, Poured forth thy bird-like melody "In native wood-notes wild:" Thou wert a joyous fairy then,
All witchery and mirth,
The youngest of the kindred band,
Around the household hearth.

But before we go any farther we would be permitted to remark, that it is almost useless for one farmer to begin the work unless all in his neighborhood, for several miles around, co-operate in the work of destruction, as the omission of a single individual to join in the labor, might render that of all the rest unavailing, as all those pests which bear winged seeds are transmitted by each succeeding wind throughout every nook and cramy of the surrounding country for many miles of extent, so that one slovenly farmer is sufficient to supply an entire neighborhood with seed enough to render unavailing the pains taking of fifty others.

their total eradication. We found it a good practice in going about our place, al-ways to carry with us one of the hoes we have described; for the two-fold purpose, of rooting up troublesome weeds and breaking up the droppings of cattle which we found in the pastures, and however inconsiderable some may think such occupation to be, we had strong evidence of the utili-ty of the practice, and, therefore, feel no hesitation in com-mending it to others. mending it to others.

We found great advantage too, in the superior cleanlines We found great advantage too, in the superior cleanliness of the succeeding year's crop of clover, in mowing the hog, weeds, which sprung up after harvest on the stubble fields where clover feed had been sown. We cut these when just in blossom, had them, after being cured, hauled near the cow yard, there stacked, and used through the ensuing winter for litter for the cattle; by which process, we not only prevented their seeding and interfering with the ensuing year's crop of grass, but secured an abundance of bedding for our stock; which added to their comfort, and to the quantity of manure at the same time. Always on removing these weeds from the field, we give it a dressing of plaster, a bushel per acre, choosing a moist day to sow it, and never failed to experience great benefit from its application.

VOLUME 30. NUMBER 96.

the models belonging to the Society on that occasion, he called the attention of the Council at the present meeting to the value of the plan proposed for effecting the object in view. The contrivance consists of the erection of a framed roofing above the stacks, and the arranging upon this from the eaves to the ridge, in the mode pursued in the ordinary slating of a house, successive layers of a flat material of the substance of hat felting, and afterwards conted with coal tar.

Mr. Marshall remarked, "For large farmers who grow a great quantity of corn and hay, I would strongly recommend the erection of sheds near every homestead; indeed they will soon save themselves with a person who may grow only for his own consumption. With this impression I beg to send you a plan and estimate of one I sm about to erect; which upon blacks and felt roofing will cost £11, one twice the size would be less, in price, in proportion, say £18; either of these properly made at the first will last from fifteen to twenty years at the very least: then bear in mind that when once your hay or corn (wheat) is ready to lead and safely under such a shed, you neither require stack cloths, thatching or other protection: against this outless, place the expense of thatching in the usual way, the same quantity for the same successive number of years, and no more need be said in its favor. The wood work I find much lighter, and the inclination of the roof not so steep by one half as slate or tiles require, and the whole cost consequently less. The frost and snow of last winter and the late heavy rains, have not made the least impression, nor is there any appearance of either damp or wet within. So satisfied am I of its merits that I am at this moment having one made to cover a stack containing upwards of 20 tons of hay. This stack covering admits of extension or contraction to any extent."

That great losses occur from want of protection in this ons of hay. This stack covering admits of extension or contraction to any extent."

That great losses occur from want of protection in this country, from the weather, for our small grain, we have never entertained the least doubt, and the necessity for such places of accommodation have been brought more sensibly than ever to our view, by the numerous losses by exposure to the rains of last summer. By adopting a thin covering, the necessity for heavy frame work is measurably rendered unnecessary and hence economy in the construction thereby promoted. The covering used in England the reader will perceive, is hat felting, but we are disposed to think strong cotton sail duck, which would come cheaper, would answer fully as well. This we would propose to cover with a paint made of coal tar and finely pulverised charcoal, and the roof made so sianting as to prevent the lodgement of snow. A roof thus constructed and covered, would, we are sure, last twenty years, and we are very certain that its cost would prove money judiciously expended.

The youngest of the kindred band, Around the household hearth. How six whose silvery locks is le low, Ah! then with life clate, Caught every lisping word of thine, My gentle sister Kate!

Oh! oft o'er Heaven's blue summer sea, The moon hath sailed along, And oft the sleeping flowers have bloomed Atspring's reviving song, And oft that moon hath looked on hopes Crushed in their virgin bloom, Those flowers have wept their incense tears O'er many a loved one's tomb.

But ah! for thee the bark of Time Hath brought a princely freight, Young Hope, and Joy, and girthood's prime His generous gift, sweet Kate!

SAVING WIRAT IN WET WASTIRE—MI. J. Prideaux, in a communication in the Exeter Flying Post, published in England, recommends the following plan for saving when a sufficient quantity of fresh quick lime placed within, and then all closed from bottom to top, and covered vithin, and then all closed from bottom to top, and covered vithin, and then all closed from bottom to top, and covered vithin, and she continue until the corn is dry, or the lime in providing that he was not difference within, which will as rapidly draw the moisture from the corn, and so continue until the corn is dry, or the lime within, which will as rapidly draw the moisture from the corn, and so continue until the corn is dry, or the lime within, and as continue until the corn is dry, or the lime within, which will as rapidly draw the moisture from the corn, and so continue until the corn is dry, or the lime with any or the lime. England, recommends the following plan for saving wheat in wet weather. He says, that

The rick should be mode heldow with the grain turned inward, a sufficient quantity of fresh quick lime placed within, and then all closed from bottom to top, and covered over to exclude the external air; the lime will rapidly dry the air within, which will as rapidly draw the moisture from the corn, and so continue until the corn is dry, or the lime saturated; and as quick lime will absorb one-third about its weight of water, and thus dry six or seven tans of wheat, and straw. For all this water must come from the wheat, if the external air is excluded, and the lime raised from the soil by a bed of stones or gravel.

"If the lime must not, of course, touch the wheat, and therefore room must be left for it to swell in slaking."

"If the lime be all slaked before the wheat be dry, it should be withdrawn, and a second quantity put in."

Mr. Clark, he found the yield per acre of the corn topped, to be 47 bush. Is lbs., and the untopped, 60 bush. 8 lbs.—From same experiments manuted by ourserves several conditions as secretioned that there was no difference of consequence in the product, when the corn was left on the untouched stalks till harvest, and when they were cut by the bottom after the corn was well glazed, but that both these methods gave a greater product than when topweight of water, and thus dry six or seven trans of wheat, and therefore room must be left for it to swell inslaking."
